

Peter Cox, new CEO of The True Learning Partnership from September 2021

Peter has had considerable experience as a senior leader in secondary schools and has been leading a successful education consultancy working across the education sector since 2011. His particular expertise is in strategic systems leadership, school improvement, teaching and learning and leadership and management at all levels. He has several years of experience working with Ofsted, initially as a seconded serving practitioner and later in a full time role as a Senior Managing Inspector and a Principal Inspector with special responsibility for schools causing concern in the primary and secondary phases. He continued to work with Ofsted through his consultancy and has worked with both primary and secondary schools in the role of School Improvement Partner focusing on school improvement and teaching and learning.

Peter has been involved in range of leadership roles across the education sector, including senior leadership posts in schools, Education Advisor for Birmingham City Council and for the Department of Education's Academy Performance and Brokerage Division. He is part of the DfE's Register of External Experts offering a range of expertise to MATs on behalf of the Regional School Commissioners across the country.

Before starting his career within the Education sector, Peter spent 15 years in industry working across the corporate and manufacturing sector and nuclear industry, culminating in Managing Director roles. He has a first class degree in design and technology and a master's degree in Education Management. He has continued to focus on his continuous professional development throughout his career, has completed the NPQH qualification and is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts.

Over recent years Peter has supported several schools by acting on their Governing and Trust Boards, including the Alsager Multi Academy Trust.
